

The Tragic Muse, Vol. 3 of 3 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Tragic Muse, Vol. 3 of 3 Mr. Carteret was propped up on pillows, and in this attitude, beneath the high, spare canopy of his bed, presented himself to Nick's picture-seeking vision as a figure in a clever composition or a novel. He had gathered strength, though this strength was not much in his voice; it was mainly in his brighter eye and his air of being pleased with himself. He put out his hand and said: I dare say you know why I sent for you; upon which Nick sank into the seat he had occupied the day before, replying that he had been delighted to come, whatever the reason. Mr. Carteret said nothing more about the division or the second reading; he only murmured that they were keeping the newspapers for him. I'm rather behind - I'm rather behind, he went on; but two or three quiet mornings will make it all right. You can go back tonight, you know - you can easily go back. This was the only thing not quite straight that Nick saw in him - his making light of his young friends flying to and fro.
